How Faculty Can Recognize & Manage Mental Health Issues In The Classroom Wednesday, March 20 ~ 3:00-4:00pm (Eastern)

Once the live date has passed, this training will be available on demand.

Overview

In any given year, about one in four American adults are diagnosable with a mental disorder. The highest prevalence of serious mental illness occurs in 18-25 year-olds, making it likely that you will at some time encounter a student with a mental health concern. While not every student with a mental disorder will present a challenge to teaching and learning, it can be difficult to differentiate between abnormal behavior, student misconduct, and mental illness, and equally difficult to know how to respond.

In this webinar, you will learn the signs, red flags, and signs of several common mental disorders and effective strategies to de-escalate problem behaviors and manage disruptions to teaching and learning due to mental health concerns. We will clarify expectations for faculty, administrators, and staff so that you can operate within your role as a faculty member to effectively support other departments and take appropriate action. Tips for how to speak to a student when making a referral and general referral resources will also be reviewed.

Objectives:

- Review relevant statistics on the prevalence of mental disorders in the United States
- Differentiate between abnormal behavior, student conduct issues, and mental disorders
- Identify the signs of Schizophrenia, Bipolar Disorder, Major Depressive Disorder, Suicide and Posttraumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD)
- Clarify expectations for different campus roles and determine appropriate responses for dealing with mental health concerns
- Explore a variety of strategies for effectively managing disruptions and de-escalating problem behaviors due to mental health concerns
- Discuss practical tips for making referrals to appropriate resources
- Generate a list of appropriate referral sources on campus and in your community
